A CHRISTMAS JOURNEY

BY E. RICHARDSON.

"Child," he said, bending over the drooping dark head, "were you very anxious to be at this ball? Is there—don't mind confessing it to an old man like me—is there any special attraction for you there?"

And poor, tearful Blanche murmured "Yes," for from over the balusters she had seen Herbert Fawcett enter the house.

The ball was at its height. Every one said every arrangement was perfect; everybody said the enjoyment was inestimable; but if one judged countenances instead of speeches, there was a little disappointment here and there, too.

Amelia Lother, beautifully dressed and looking excessively plain, was courted as she had expected; and Herbert Fawcett, dancing very little and scrutinizing every passer-by restlessly, was condemning the whole thing.

Suddenly, as the latter was leaning against the door of a room which was temporarily deserted, he heard the faint rustle of a dress crossing the hall, and some magnetic attraction it must have been which impelled him to turn and behold the most dazzling vision he had ever seen.

Leaning upon a middle-aged gentleman's arm, a lady advanced in trailing white robes, with diamonds gleaming from amidst her wavy tresses, diamonds flashing from her snowy neck and ears, diamonds upon her arms and hands.

"Miss Hilward!" cried Fawcett, darting forward.

Blanche trembled and dropped her fan. Mr. Lother (for the elderly gentleman was he), with one rapid glance from the girl's to the young man's countenance, quickly effaced himself, and Fawcett made the most of the opportunity.

"Why have you disappointed me for so long?" asked he, reproachfully. "I thought you were not coming at all. Did you not get my note, Blanche?"

"Your note?" wonderingly. "I never heard of it."

"My note asking you to meet me here and give me the answer to—to—Blanche, you know I love you; what need for useless preamble! You care for me a little, darling, don't you?"

And so on while the music swelled louder, and Amelia in the ball-room waxed more cross; and Mrs. Lother and Mrs. Fawcett, sitting again with their heads very close together, mutually congratulated one another upon the success of their plots.

The gorgeous supper had commenced, the room was filled to overflowing, and at the head of the daintily laden table sat Mrs. Lother, smiling on all, friends and guests alike. She looked up with a smile when she heard a little murmur of surprise and admiration running round the room; but her lips stiffened into an expression devoid of mirth as, following the direction all looks had taken, she saw her poor relation steering his way down the room towards her, and leaning on his arm, a person who looked like Blanche; but how could it be Blanche, with diamonds that a duchess might have sighed for in vain, flashing and glowing upon her.

Mr. Lother quietly took his place near his sister-in-law, and looked round upon the perplexed guests.

Dear Sir: Your valued favor of November 18th is to hand, containing your order to which we have given our closest attention, and you may rest assured we have spared no pains to make this initial order satisfactory, having closely followed your instructions, sincerely hoping by fair dealing to secure your entire patronage in the Clothing Line.

We are willing to make you our Special Agent for the Hawaiian Islands, and consequently can offer you Special Inducements on prices, as we are thoroughly satisfied that a proper representation of our goods will, as has always been the case in the past, take precedence above all other makes of Ready Made Clothing, as we are here, driving our competitors out of the market.
